The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (Fifth Edition) includes mild and moderate intellectual and developmental disabilities (I/DD) in its diagnostic and classification system. In this study, we examined if the trajectory of severity of I/DD is similar to that of intellectual disability (ID) in general and affective and behavioral disorders in children and adults, and if the distinction between mild and moderate I/DD is meaningful. The outcome data on 134 children and adolescents with mild and moderate I/DD and 23 adults with mild I/DD were extracted from the Netherlands Institute of Mental Health and Addiction database. Cox proportional hazards regression analysis was used to test the association between mild and moderate I/DD and adult major depression, anxiety disorders, and substance use disorders. For all disorders, mild I/DD were predicted to have a lower risk for remission/full remission compared to moderate I/DD. The prediction of remission/full remission among adults with mild I/DD was similar to that of ID. The mild and moderate I/DD groups did not differ in the trajectory of symptom severity over time. The difference in severity of mild and moderate I/DD compared to ID appears to be similar in children and adults and to be most pronounced on symptom dimensions of mood disorders and behavioral disorders. This could lead to unnecessary diagnostic and treatment decisions as it does for ID in general and IDD in children. Meanwhile, the two leading candidates for the 648931e174
